Methodology

Primary Indicator: To gauge China's progress improving domestic financial system efficiency we develop a modified ratio of gross fixed capital formation to quarterly GDP growth, a measure known as the incremental capital output ratio. We impute quarterly capital stock and output values for China to permit us to gauge financial reform on a "quarterly ICOR" basis, hence "Quicor". Gross fixed capital formation measures the increase in a country's capital stock (roughly speaking, the sum of new business investment that contributes to fixed assets) minus the disposal of fixed assets, and excluding depreciation and land purchases. A measure of seven implies that for every seven units of investment, there is one additional unit of output. A rising ratio means that more investment is necessary to produce the same amount of output, and is therefore less efficient. OECD countries have an average ICOR of around three; above five is generally considered to be inefficient.

A nation's financial system includes the markets and mechanisms through which financial resources flow between savers and borrowers, the institutions, rules, prices and practices which shape those flows (including internationally), and the intermediaries involved. China's goals for reforming its financial system include improving efficiency (return on investment), reducing risk, and preserving state influence. China has made important strides on financial system reform, but much remains unfinished and the liabilities generated by the residual reform required get larger and larger with time. Financial efficiency as a whole has deteriorated in recent years, and the system's ability to finance future growth is faltering.

Rapid economic development combined with lax enforcement of regulations in China has resulted in severely polluted air and water. This pollution in turn has impacted both the health of the Chinese populace as well as overall GDP growth. Indeed, studies estimate premature deaths from air pollution at i to 2 million per year and the World Bank puts the overall cost of China's water crisis at 2.3% of GDP. These impacts have not gone unnoticed from policy makers and aggressive laws, action plans, and goals still to say whether due to an unplanned heavy industrial slowdown or rather to better policy enforcement. Either way, significant work remains to be done to raise China's air and water to international standards.

The modern world is in a movement and people everywhere are looking for quick, safe means of accessing accurate information.

Rapid economic development combined with lax enforcement of regulations in China has resulted in severely polluted air and water. This pollution in turn has impacted both the health of the Chinese populace as well as overall GDP growth. Indeed, studies estimate premature deaths from air pollution at i to 2 million per year and the World Bank puts the overall cost of China's water crisis at 2.3% of GDP. These impacts have not gone unnoticed from policy makers and aggressive laws, action plans, and goals still to say whether due to an unplanned heavy industrial slowdown or rather to better policy enforcement. Either way, significant work remains to be done to raise China's air and water to international standards.
